Several practices surrounding race/ethnicity in research are not given much consideration. Some researchers don't give much thought to aggregating race/ethnic groups to improve power. Others may not consider which race/ethnic group should serve as the referent group. And approaches to measuring race/ethnicity has been the domain of social scientists for far too long.

In this talk, sponsored by the Biostatistics, Epidemiology, & Research Design (BERD) program, we will dig deeper into these commonplace practices to better understand their implications for health.
