

Food Systems & Society Curricular Focus

The FSS program focuses on social justice and social change in food systems and society. The FSS curriculum supports students in developing and applying knowledge to address social problems in the food system through critical inquiry. By critical inquiry we mean working to uncover the causes and effects of inequity through scholarship in order to reduce or eliminate it. The program's learning objectives are to:

1. Explain concepts, theories, and processes of social justice and social change in food systems and society.
2. Analyze theory and evidence to address social problems in food systems and society.
3. Apply critical thinking, communication, and collaboration skills to address social problems in food systems and society.
