This certificate program offers working professionals and students an understanding of the Total Worker Health® approach. It provides information on the key determinants of physical and psychological health encountered at work, and demonstrates how to be better equipped to act on these determinants as part of an interdisciplinary workplace team. Participants will gain skills to improve worker health and well-being and better support organizational and human capital sustainability, success, and productivity.

This certificate program is designed to:

- Foster engaging conversations about Total Worker Health® concepts, occupational health psychology, and leadership development.
- Combine online and onsite courses offered in collaboration with the Oregon Healthy Workforce Center, the Center for Leadership and Strategic Thinking at the UW Foster School of Business and the Portland State University Occupational Health Psychology and Total Worker Health® Program.
- Integrate a course in Total Worker Health® that aligns with classes in Ergonomics, Industrial Hygiene, Supervisory Duties, and Safety & Health Management conducted by the Pacific Northwest OSHA Education Center.

Target Audience: Safety professionals, human resource specialists, risk managers, union leaders, wellness coordinators, sustainability professionals, and other professionals who intersect with occupational health and well-being.
